1. In early March 1952, troops of the 21 Army, formerly stationed at Huangyen (121-15, 28-41), moved, probably to T'ient'ai (121-02, 29-10). The 62 Division remained in the Huangyen, Haimen (121-25, 28-43) and Chinch'ing Harbor (121-34, 28-32) areas.
2. On 15 March, LI Chin (李進), director of the Operations Department of the East China Naval Command, arrived at Haimen from Shanghai via Hangchow with a large group of naval personnel and gave a talk to boost morale.
3. As of 20 March, headquarters of the 104 Division, 35 Army,¹ was at Linhai (121-07, 28-53) and its command post at Wenling (121-21, 28-23). Subordinate units were disposed as follows: The 310 Regiment in the Wenling area; the 311 Regiment in the T'aochu (121-33, 28-51) -T'uhsiach'iao (121-32, 28-48) area; and the 312 Regiment at Luch'iao (路橋)².
4. Since fall 1951, local militia corps along the East Chekiang coast had been assembled in local cities for training and issued Chinese-made single-shot rifles. After training they were sent home to assist in defense work and in organizing the people.
5. In early March the Chinese Communists were building defense works at Chinch'ing Harbor, which had been closed since late February to prevent leakage of military information.³
6. In mid-March civilian laborers were conscripted to complete bamboo rafts at Haimen. These rafts were approximately 20 feet long and 6 feet wide and were stacked at the base of a hill near the city.
